WHO CLEANS THE WATER OFFICE?

The Water Commission Says Anderson, But Anderson Says No.

There is likely to be a good sized row between Janitor Andrew Anderson, of the city hall, on the one hand, and the city water commission on the other. The bone of contention is whether the present janitor shall care for the office room of the commission in the city hall, or whether another man shall be employed for this task. The matter is now before the public property committee for action, and both the janitor and water commission are waiting the outcome.

The commission is of the opinion that Anderson can easily do the work incidental to cleaning their office, and when they moved to their present quarters a month ago, dismissed their old janitor. Mr. Anderson, on the other hand asserts that he has all the work he can do the way it is, and is positive that the committee on public property will not add to his present work.

As the matter now stands Anderson is not doing anything more than his regular duties at the city hall—while the water commission office has not been cleaned for weeks.

Professor Garman looks upon the suggestion as a good one and he will take the matter up with the students of the High school in a few days. Such debates have been held in other states and have proved of inestimable value to the students taking part in the oratorical contests to say nothing of the benefits derived by every student in the schools represented in the joint debates.
